A photograph brings together three men connected by a shared place in the leadership history of the Colorado Chapter of 100 Black Men of America: TH Mack, Sr., Dr. Larry Borem, and Mr. Gene Jackson. Known here as “The Big 3,” these past presidents represent three chapters of the organization’s local story.

The portrait offers an opportunity to recognize each man’s service as president and reflect on the responsibilities that come with community leadership. Taking on that role means accepting the work of guiding an organization while helping carry its purpose forward. Although their individual terms and experiences differ, their shared distinction as past presidents connects them across those periods of leadership.

For TH Mack, Sr., standing alongside Dr. Borem and Mr. Jackson places his own presidency within that broader history. The image preserves a connection among people who have held the same responsibility, each bringing his own perspective to the role.

It also invites reflection on continuity. An organization’s story extends beyond any single administration. Successive leaders inherit relationships, responsibilities, and aspirations, then pass them forward to those who follow. Remembering past presidents helps keep the people behind that history visible.

“The Big 3” is a fitting title for this portrait of shared leadership. Rather than documenting individual achievements, the photograph draws the three men together in one frame, offering a moment to acknowledge their respective places in the Colorado Chapter’s history.

Featured on THMackSr.info, this photograph honors TH Mack, Sr., Dr. Larry Borem, and Mr. Gene Jackson as three past presidents whose service forms part of the chapter’s continuing story. It is a keepsake of their connection and an invitation to remember the people who have accepted the responsibility to lead.
